Registrability of surnames and personal names

The principles for assessing the distinctive character of marks constituted by surnames have been considered in the European Court of Justice's ("ECJ") judgment in Case-404/02 Nichols plc v Registrar of Trade Marks [2005] R.P.C. 12.

In Nichols, the ECJ confirmed that the assessment of the distinctive character of a trade mark constituted by a surname, even a common one, must be carried out specifically, in accordance with the criteria applicable to any sign, in relation, first, to the products or services in respect of which registration is applied for and, second to the perception of the relevant consumers. The criteria for assessment of the distinctive character of trade marks constituted by a personal name are the same as those applicable to other categories of trade marks.

Stricter general criteria of assessment based on:

- a predetermined number of persons with the same name, above which that name may be regarded as devoid of distinctive character,
- the number of undertakings providing products or services of the type covered by the application for registration, or
- the prevalence or otherwise of the use of surnames in the relevant trade cannot be applied to surname marks as a rule-of-thumb.

Registration of a trade mark constituted by a surname cannot be refused for the purpose of ensuring that no advantage is afforded to the first applicant for registration.

All relevant facts and circumstances should be taken into account. It is proper to take into account any and all characteristics of the sign in question which bear upon its distinctiveness according to the perception of the average consumer of the goods and services in question (Oska Ltd's Trade Mark Application [2005] R.P.C. 20).

The average consumer does not necessarily perceive surnames in the same way as other categories of signs and this may make it more difficult to establish that they are distinctive. Individuals generally acquire surnames at birth, and they form an important part of an individual's identity. It is inherent in the nature of surnames that they are shared with a greater or lesser number of other individuals. Those other individuals may also supply the relevant goods or services or desire to do so.

The commonness of a surname is a factor that may be taken into account as part of a specific assessment of the distinctive character of the surname in relation to the goods or services in question, particularly where the field in question is one where the use of surnames to designate origin is prevalent.

Examination of trade marks consisting of surnames

In view of the above decisions, the Registrar will not predetermine the number of persons with the same name above which that name would be regarded as devoid of distinctive character. A surname, whether it is common or not, must be specifically assessed for distinctive character in accordance with the same criteria applicable to all categories of marks.

The commonness of a surname is a factor that may be taken into account as part of the specific assessment of the distinctive character of a particular surname in respect of the goods and services applied for. The number of entries in telephone directories can give some indication as to the commonness of a surname. The Registrar will take into account all relevant circumstances, including the commonness of using surnames in the relevant trade, and the number of traders in that trade, as part of the specific assessment of the distinctiveness of the relevant mark in respect of the goods and services applied for.

For example, in Oska Ltd's Trade Mark Application [2005] R.P.C. 20, it is considered that the surname "MORGAN" in relation to clothing would be devoid of distinctive character without use.

A surname which is objectionable under section 11(1)(b) may still be acceptable for registration if it has in fact acquired distinctive character as a result of the use made of it (section 11(2)). To show acquired distinctive character, the applicant must file evidence of use of the mark.

DR. CHEN

For example, 陳博士 for goods in Classes 3 and 5 was accepted on the basis of distinctiveness acquired through use.

Surnames in simplified Chinese characters are treated in the same way as surnames in traditional Chinese characters.

Surnames with other meanings

A word that is a common surname may, apart from being a surname, have another meaning and that meaning may face an objection to registration under sections 11(1)(b) to (d) of the Ordinance. For example the word "BROWN" and the Chinese character "黃" if applied to 'paints' may face an objection under sections 11(1)(b) and (c) of the Ordinance because it designates a characteristics (colour) of the goods.

Personal names and forenames

Full personal names (combining a forename or given name and a surname) on the whole have more capacity to distinguish than surnames. 李廣海 for goods in Class 5, and CARMEN HO for goods in Classes 14, 18 and 25 have been accepted. Forenames may be devoid of distinctive character in relation to, for example, those goods where use of forenames as decoration is common, e.g. key chains, mugs.

Names and images of famous people

Applications to register the name or image of a famous person or well-known organisation can be made by that person or organisation, or with their consent in writing. If it is not made by that person or organisation, or is not made with their written consent, we must refuse the application on grounds of bad faith (section 11(5)(b)).

In an application to register the name or image of someone who has died recently, consent must be given by the personal representatives (executors or administrators) or by the successor to the business.

Apart from the authority to apply, the name or image of a famous person must be “capable of distinguishing”, that is, it must be capable of functioning as a badge of trade origin. The test is whether the name or image is likely to be taken as an indication that the goods or services have come from a particular source, or if the use of the name in relation to the goods or services will merely be seen as a commemoration of that famous person or as an indication that they are about that person.

See Elvis Presley Trade Marks [1999] RPC 567, where the marks ELVIS and ELVIS PRESLEY were refused, as members of the public purchased Elvis Presley merchandise not because it came from a particular source, but because it carried the name or image of Elvis Presley.

If a well known person’s name is likely to result in a demand for memorabilia, the general public are unlikely to see that name as anything other than an indication of the content or character of goods, rather than as an indication of trade origin.

If the name of an artist or a group of artists affixed to compact discs and displayed on packaging merely indicates the name of the performer whose performance is recorded on the compact disc, and if this use of the name is not likely to be understood as indicating the trade source of the goods, then such use would be descriptive only. By identifying the performer it would be descriptive of the contents of the disc and nothing more. Whether particular labeling and packaging satisfy this test is a question of fact in each case.

Furthermore, a mark may by becoming distinctive for one class of goods or services (e.g. musical performances) become descriptive for another class of goods or services (e.g. posters, mugs and compact discs).

Applicants have to file evidence to show that the name or image of the famous person has a connection with the applicant, as it is wrong to assume that only a celebrity, or his successor, would ever market his own character (see Elvis Presley, supra).

Other factors that affect the question of whether a famous person's name or image indicates trade origin include the following (although not all these factors will be relevant in every case):

- the nature and extent of the individual's reputation;
- whether any trade in souvenirs has developed, and the reasons for this;
- whether the famous person or individual has established any trade mark rights during his or her lifetime;
- whether descendants or trustees have established any rights and the nature of those rights;
- the extent to which demand for commercial consumer items is generated by the media or the public interest; and
- the nature of the goods in respect of which registration was sought.

(See Jane Austen Trade Mark [2000] RPC 879 at 886). Applying these considerations in relation to JANE AUSTEN, the mark was found to be incapable of serving as a badge of origin, in respect of a line of toiletry items.

To take another example, an application for the name ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL in respect of “charitable collections, financial grant services, charitable fund raising services for the preservation and rehabilitation of sites, artefacts, and papers reflecting the scientific and historical heritage of Alexander Graham Bell” would, in the absence of evidence of distinctiveness, merely be taken as an indication of the nature of the services to be provided under the mark. Because of the historic reputation of the inventor, the use of his name would be seen as descriptive of activities promoting his work and his scientific and historical significance, not as indication of the trade origin of the services.

It is important to make the distinction between names of persons and names of organisations associated with certain goods or services. DIANA, PRINCESS OF WALES was refused registration in the United Kingdom but PRINCESS DIANA MEMORIAL FUND was accepted. The latter mark presents itself as the name of an undertaking responsible for the particular charitable fund raising services named in the specification. It is source-specific and indicates a trade connection rather than a characteristic of the goods (see Diana, Princess of Wales Trade Mark [2002] ETMR 254 and Diana, Princess of Wales Memorial Fund Trade Mark (UK Registry, 25 January 2002)).

Famous person actually trading

On the other hand, if the person actually trades in the goods or services of the application, the mark is likely to be able to indicate trade origin (see LINDA McCARTNEY registered in classes 29, 30 and 31 in Hong Kong, registration nos. 6214/99, 6215/99 and 6216/99).

Fictitious character

Characters of fiction may be trade marks, but this would depend on the ability of the public to identify them as indicators of origin, and not to simply see them as characters or titles or items of decoration. In relation to publications, whether recorded or in print, for example, the public is well used to discriminating between e.g. the publisher and the title of the book or publication.

The use of the name of a character in the title of a book, for example, like the use of the name of a band to a CD, may not be regarded as trade mark use in the absence of evidence that the name is perceived by the relevant consumers as being an indication as to the origin of such goods. Without such evidence, such use may be treated as merely indicating the content of the goods.

The question of whether a particular usage is or is not trade mark use is a question of fact in each case.

Name of author

Just because the applicant owns the copyright to literary works and is the author of the works does not mean that the name of the author may be registered. As a matter of policy, if there is an overlap in intellectual property protection, such as trade mark rights which may be perpetual and copyright which is finite, it is contradictory to grant trade mark rights if this will have the effect of prolonging the monopoly after copyright in the work has expired.

More importantly, since other traders might wish to use the work after expiry of the copyright, as indeed they will be entitled to do after expiry of the copyright, the granting of trade mark rights in the author's name will hinder this possibility. Objection to registration will be appropriate under section 11(1)(c) and/or (b). See Jane Austen Trade Mark [2000] RPC 879.

Signatures

An application to register a person's signature can be made by that person, or with his consent, in writing, permitting the applicant to make the application (see Names and images of famous people above). If it is not made by that person, or with his consent in writing, or if authenticity of the signature is an issue, we must refuse the application on grounds of bad faith.

Signatures are generally considered distinctive and are registrable prima facie (Elvis Presley, supra) as long as there are no difficulties with regard to consent or authenticity. For example,  has been accepted for goods and services in Classes 16, 18, 25 and 42. The same considerations apply for signatures in Chinese characters.

However, a name in perfect script that is indistinguishable from an ordinary typeface is not a signature. It is treated in the same way as surnames and personal names (see above).

For questions regarding a signature mark conflicting with an earlier mark, see Elvis Presley at 595, where the signature “Elvis A Presley” and the mark “Elvisly Yours” shared a cursive script and were considered confusingly similar. In relation to the similarity of marks, the similarity of goods or services, and the distinctiveness of marks and their likelihood for confusion, see chapter on Relative grounds for refusal.

Because signatures qualify for trade mark registration in view of their unique representation, a disclaimer of exclusive rights for the name in plain form is not necessary.
